LOOK Closely at a tiny PIECE of GLASS.

Though a spark may dance if it catches the light just right, by itself, its beauty is limited. But connect it with many other tiny pieces of glass and an elaborate pattern emerges…a picture…a whole.

A community is like that. Each person, neighborhood and institution has a vital function that carries its own importance. But connect them – find synergies, address challenges, discover common goals – and what can be accomplished multiplies.

We like to think Community Foundation of the Lowcountry serves as a connector, identifying individual pieces of glass and joining them together. Whether it’s connecting donors and volunteers to nonprofits, nonprofits to grants, students to the arts or low-income households to public sewer, our understanding of local issues and our own connections within the region give us the ability – and the duty – to put the pieces together.

This year’s annual report shares some of the ways Community Foundation of the Lowcountry connects the tiny pieces of glass in our community and how we contribute to the creation of a beautiful community mosaic.
As one of almost 750 community foundations across the country, Community Foundation of the Lowcountry is a tax exempt public charity focusing on local needs. Our mission is to build and strengthen our community and we accomplish this in a number of ways.

We offer a variety of giving vehicles that are easy to set up and that provide tax benefits. We invest and administer these charitable funds, alleviating paperwork for those who establish funds and making it practically effortless to engage in meaningful philanthropy.

We nurture the nonprofit sector. We provide training to strengthen nonprofit boards and improve operations. We develop comprehensive initiatives that give nonprofits helpful tools to more effectively reach donors and volunteers. We fund grants that help local nonprofits launch or expand programs, build capacity and successfully fulfill their missions.

We support higher education and manage scholarship funds that benefit local students.

We identify emerging issues and convene community leaders to address them.

We know our communities, share your interests and care about the future.

“Our toilets would back up into the house. We’d have to slow down our water usage. We couldn’t do wash. We’d have to call and get it pumped out,” she says. “It was a constant cycle.” And it was expensive.

Days is one of many Native Islanders who has watched Hilton Head Island develop into a world-class resort, all the while fighting for some of the basic services most of us take for granted. “It was particularly stressful when my children were small. It just wasn’t healthy.”

Days and her neighbors are now connected to the public sewer system, thanks to grants from the Community Foundation’s Project SAFE Fund. When she heard about the grants several years ago, she went door-to-door in her neighborhood to explain the application process. She says all her neighbors are now connected to public sewer and they no longer have to deal with the problems associated with septic systems.

Those problems don’t affect only those with septic systems. According to Dr. Stephen Borgianini, associate professor of ecology and evolutionary biology at University of South Carolina Beaufort, we all feel the impact of faulty septic systems. “If a system fails on one property, it migrates and impacts adjacent homeowners. Through various routes it finds its way to the very environmentally-sensitive surface water and contaminates it,” he says. “Once contaminants reach the waterway, there’s no limit to where they can travel.” He says this spread of contaminants exposes individuals to pathogens and degrades the environment. “So the collective population and the environment are impacted.”

Hilton Head Mayor David Bennett feels we have a moral obligation to solve the problem. “If we’re going to claim a legacy of environmental stewardship, it’s inconceivable to me that we can let this problem persist,” he says. Public sewer access claimed a top spot in Bennett’s mayoral campaign platform. “It was a sign of marginalization of some of our longest-standing citizens and I wasn’t willing to accept that.”

The issue of public sewer access isn’t a new one. Community Foundation of the Lowcountry established the Project SAFE (Sewer Access for Everyone) fund back in 2000. Hilton Head Public Service District (PSD) recognized the need to help residents connect to public sewer and established a round-up program in 2006, with money raised going into the Project SAFE Fund.

Pete Nardi, general manager for Hilton Head PSD, agrees that the effects of this project are of critical importance. “About $800,000 has been donated to Project SAFE since 2001, which has helped more than 400 families connect to sewer. We’re proud that over $238,000 was raised by the PSD’s round-up program, showing that our customers also understand the need and support this project.”

But now, through the Community Foundation’s efforts, Hilton Head Island Town Council voted to allocate $5.8 million for sewer line installation and PSD has earmarked $3.5 million for pump stations and project management costs. The only thing missing is money to fund grants for low-income households to connect their homes to the main lines. Those connections can run as high $13,000 each.

That’s what the Community Foundation is addressing. “The Community Foundation and PSD have been working together to connect qualified homeowners to public sewer since 2006,” Jim Allhusen, Community Foundation board member and chair of the Project SAFE Committee says. “But we still have hundreds of homes to connect. Our goal is to get all qualified homeowners connected by 2020. That’s why we’ve launched a capital campaign – the first in our history – called Connect for Good. Working together with the Town of Hilton Head Island and PSD, we can do it. But only if the community supports our efforts.”

Connect for Good aims to raise $3 million over the next several years. The Community Foundation has taken the first step in reaching this goal. In March, the Community Foundation board of directors voted to grant $500,000 toward the effort.

“We believe in putting our money where our mouth is,” Allhusen says. “Project SAFE is one of the most important initiatives Hilton Head Island has seen and it’s one of the most important initiatives the Community Foundation has undertaken. We are committed to supporting it, not only by acting as fiscal agent for grants, screening applicants for eligibility and raising $3 million, but by contributing to the $3 million fundraising goal. We hope the community will get behind this effort, because it affects us all.”

Betty Days says having access to public sewer is a blessing. “We’re so grateful there are people concerned about those of us affected by this. They’re helping us to live a more comfortable life.”

It’s been said a person’s favorite topic of conversation is himself. It’s no different for nonprofit organizations. When they work hard to tackle a problem, they want people to know about it.

Community Foundation of the Lowcountry wants the community to know about these achievements as well, so we found a way to help connect our community to our hard-working nonprofits. Working with GuideStar, we created The Giving Marketplace, a free online tool that offers nonprofits a forum to share information about themselves.

“It’s a great place to blow our horn, highlight the things we do best, talk about our new programs and show the community how we’re fulfilling our mission,” says Pam Wall, executive director of The Literacy Center. “It’s like the Good Housekeeping Seal® of approval.”

Launched in July 2015, more than 130 local nonprofits have logged in to create or begin creating their individual profiles. Log in, select a profile and you’ll find comprehensive information about the nonprofit’s mission, programs, governance, outcomes and financials. The Giving Marketplace is a great tool for anyone who’s connected to nonprofits – donors, funders, media, volunteers, potential board members, job hunters – just about all of us, really.

Carole Galli, chair of the 2017 All Saints Garden Tour, says they recently started using The Giving Marketplace in their grantmaking process.

Carole and her committee “strongly encourage” grant applicants to create a profile on The Giving Marketplace. “The Giving Marketplace has allowed us to make our grantmaking process easier. It saves paper and time for both the committee and the applicants.”

Instead of requiring grant applicants to supply copies of their tax forms and audits, descriptions of their programs, a list of board members, and all the other paperwork nonprofits must complete for a grant, the committee has instead decided to access The Giving Marketplace for this information. “We’ll review their Giving Marketplace profiles during the decision process,” Carole says. “All the information is right there. I’d like to go out to every grantor and funder and say, ‘Do yourself a favor and do this!’”

The Giving Marketplace is also a terrific tool for donors, providing insight into organizations that share their philanthropic values and helping them determine the impact of their donation.

Volunteering offers immeasurable benefits to nonprofit organizations and to those who share their time.

To help facilitate connecting volunteers and nonprofits, Community Foundation of the Lowcountry hosts Lowcountry Volunteer Connections, an online tool in which nonprofits list their volunteer opportunities and volunteers find their perfect match.

Several years ago NAMI (National Alliance on Mental Illness) Lowcountry was in search of volunteers and Laurie Shay, of Bluffton, discovered a life-changing opportunity.

We sat down with Sarah Eliasoph, executive director of NAMI Lowcountry, and Laurie Shay, a volunteer at NAMI, to talk about their experience.

Q: Laurie, how did you connect with NAMI?
LAURIE: Someone told me to go to the Community Foundation site. I found the link to Lowcountry Volunteer Connections and searched the list. When I saw the NAMI listing, I said, “Oh, look! That would work for me. I can do that!”

Q: Was this your first volunteer experience?
LAURIE: I volunteered for several local organizations, but I got kind of burned out. I gave myself some time to regroup and then I called NAMI. Because I have a mental illness, I knew it was an opportunity for me to reach out to the community.

SARAH: Laurie came in and I thought, “Not only someone who will talk about it (mental illness), but wants to help and is an organized business person.” I think she just flew in on wings.

LAURIE: I trained for our “In Our Own Voice” presentation. That’s where two people with mental illness tell their story (to others with mental illness). Then I trained to be a facilitator for our Connections meetings – a support group. That program has grown from one meeting to multiple meetings throughout the area.

SARAH: The growth of the program speaks to the power of volunteering. The meetings used to have about four or five people attend. Now there are 12 to 15 people. All our programs are peer-led. That’s why it’s so unusual to get such a fabulous volunteer to find us!

Q: You obviously give a lot of your time, your energy, your talents. What do you get in return?
LAURIE: Volunteering has given me an opportunity to give back to my community, which offers me a sense of purpose and hope because I get to work with people like me, so I’m not alone. On a more practical note, it’s important for me in managing my illness to have avenues for challenging myself intellectually. Volunteering at NAMI offers me an avenue for structuring my life.

SARAH: Without trained volunteers for our programs, along with office volunteers and fundraising volunteers, NAMI wouldn’t be alive – we’d be dead in the water. We can’t live without volunteers.

Q: Laurie, what are some of your other volunteer “jobs”?
LAURIE: I’m also trained as a mentor – a teacher of our peer-to-peer program. I serve on the NAMI board of directors and I’m the interim chair for our consumer council.

Just as the Lowcountry emerged from an uncomfortable summer of record-breaking heat and humidity, Mother Nature offered us a new challenge. Hurricane Matthew seemed to target us, slowly and angrily meandering up the coast. Most of us evacuated, praying the meteorologists were wrong, that Matthew would take a sudden turn west, that our homes and livelihoods would be spared. Some of us were lucky. Some of us, not so much.

Each June 1st we’re reminded that hurricanes are, once again, a possibility. But we write them off, reciting long-ago dates of “the last time we were hit,” blissfully convincing ourselves we’re somehow exempt and rationalizing that the balmy weather and beautiful landscapes make the gamble worth it.

But natural disasters are an ever-present possibility—a part of the local landscape. With that realization, Community Foundation of the Lowcountry established the Disaster Recovery and Rebuilding Fund in 2004. The purpose of the fund is to provide local nonprofits with dollars to help our community in meeting the immediate needs of the individuals and families they serve, and in the long-term rebuilding process.

One day after the storm hit the Lowcountry, Community Foundation’s board of directors voted to add an additional $100,000 to the fund. Within days, grants were awarded to American Red Cross, Bluffton Self Help and Deep Well Project—nonprofit organizations providing direct service to those most in need. As time passes, the focus of the grants will change from recovery to rebuilding.

The outpouring of assistance and good deeds has been overwhelming. We’ve all heard stories of neighbor helping neighbor or, even more impressive, neighbor helping stranger, in the immediate aftermath of the storm. Those stories help us move past the devastation and forget the beating we took.

Hurricane Matthew isn’t over. There will be ongoing needs in our community. We’re thankful the Disaster Recovery and Rebuilding Fund will be a resource for restoring our way of life. But the fund relies on the generosity of our donors and community to continue the rebuilding process.

Most of us still believe the gamble of living here is worth it—that the beauty we’re so privileged to experience every day makes the odds acceptable. It’s nice to know that when we face another disaster, Community Foundation of the Lowcountry will be here to provide support to get back on our feet, helping us stay Lowcountry Strong.

Please consider a donation to our Disaster Recovery and Rebuilding Fund. You can do it online (cf-lowcountry.org) or by check, using the enclosed envelope.
Twelve years ago, Bob Onorato, a Community Foundation of the Lowcountry board member, had the idea to establish a public art fund.

Working with the Town of Hilton Head Island, an agreement was struck that the fund would raise money to purchase large-scale sculptures that would be donated to the town to build a permanent art collection.

Later, when Hilton Head developer JR Richardson sat on the Community Foundation’s board of directors, his passion for the arts and for beautifying Hilton Head Island brought to fruition the fund’s first public art installation. Under JR’s leadership, a committee raised over $126,000 to commission “Charles E. Fraser,” which was permanently installed at Compass Rose Park in 2010.

Since that time, eight other pieces have been added to the collection, most secured via the Public Art Exhibition on Hilton Head Island, a biennial event sponsored by the Public Art Fund and held at Coastal Discovery Museum. Through it all, the sentiment that launched the Public Art Fund in 2004 has remained constant. “Public art sets the tone for a community,” Richardson says. “Each piece has its own personality and creates interest and intrigue for our island.”

David Bennett, mayor of Hilton Head Island agrees. “Art speaks to people. It allows people to come together and have discussions,” he says. “My desire is to see all citizens touched by art, nature and our culture. Our public art program allows everyone — those with means and those without — to enjoy the beauty of art.”

Providing everyone a chance to enjoy public art led to an additional partnership with Island School Council for the Arts (ISCA), which makes arrangements for school-aged children to get involved in the exhibition. During the 2015 exhibition, local high school students helped build “Tally,” a metal piece that has been permanently installed on Highway 278 on the north end of the island; elementary school students enjoyed field trips to the exhibition; and two participating artists visited schools to conduct hands-on presentations.

“There’s really no accessible art on that scale in the area,” Patti Maurer, executive director of ISCA says. “That’s why it’s so exciting to see artists of that caliber bringing these pieces and for our kids to have access to them. And having the artists come into the schools made a big impact on the students that were involved.”

We think everyone benefits from public art. Perhaps Richardson sums it up best, “I believe public art can click something inside of you that rewires you and makes you think differently. Public art is for everyone and we have such a generous community that reaches deep to ensure everyone has the chance to enjoy it.”

CONNECTING STUDENTS TO EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES

As the cost of higher education continues to climb, students and their families seek ways to offset college expenses. One of the best ways to do this is through scholarships. Community Foundation of the Lowcountry has almost 40 scholarship funds to connect deserving students to post-secondary educational opportunities. Each scholarship has distinct criteria, established by the funder. When you establish a scholarship fund, you can serve in an advisory role, recommend an advisory committee, or allow the Community Foundation to select students based on criteria you develop.

Last year, Community Foundation of the Lowcountry awarded almost $644,000 in scholarships to 145 students who were attending one of 60 colleges or universities. If you’d like to support hardworking students through establishing a scholarship, or if you know a student who could use some help in attaining their educational dreams, contact us. We’ll be happy to talk with you about our scholarships.
